"The South 40"
by JAMES A. SMITH
EXTENSION AGENT

This is a great year for Scuppernong grapes. This is a Muscadine type grape that is grown more often east and south of here. In more southern states practically everyone has at least one scuppernong vine. These grapes turn copper color in late September and early October.

Although they may be somewhat more difficult to transplant than the bunch grape, it's worth the effort. The sweetness and delightful flavor is unequaled.

Topsail is one of the newer varieties and is a good selection for the home gardener.

We've had several calls about lime quality; that is, particle size.

The majority of limestone used in Appomattox County comes from a local quarry. Management of this plant is registered to sell two kinds of limestone; ground limestone and coarse ground limestone. The difference in these two products is particle size. The minimum standard for ground limestone is for 100% it pass through a 10 mesh screen and 50% through a 100 mesh screen. Course ground limestone minimum standard is that 100% must also pass a 10 mesh screen but only 30% need pass a 100 mesh screen.

The registration for selling course ground limestone was issued September 28, 1971.

Fineness, or mesh size, is the main factor influencing the rate of reaction of applied lime. This does not mean that lime should immediately react with the soil to be of maximum value. A certain amount should be sufficiently fine (pass an 80 mesh screen) to react rapidly with the larger portion of soil acidity. Another part (40-60 mesh) should react within one to two years with the remainder (20 mesh) reacting in a period of two to three years. For a liming material to react in this manner it must be composed of lime particles of different mesh size.

Appomattox soils are generally made up of smaller particles than those soils of eastern Virginia; therefore, lime particle size becomes more important to Appomattox producers.

Effective contact surface increases with the fineness, or increasing the mesh size, of lime. Similarly, the rate of reaction of limestone increases with increase in contact surface.

Particle size also affects crop yield and percent of soil acidity neutralized. If soil pH is 6.2 particle size would not be as important as it would if soil pH is 5.0.

The University of West Virginia demonstrates the importance of finer ground materials this way:

How much limestone with 30% held on a 20 mesh screen and 30% passing a 60 mesh screen would be required if a soil test shows the need of 2 tons of finely ground limestone.

In one ton of this ground limestone you would have 600 pounds of material coarser than 20 mesh (30% X 2000 lbs.), 800 pounds between 20 and 60 mesh size (40% X 2000 lbs.) and 600 pounds finer than 60 mesh (30% X 2000 lbs.). Only 20% of the 20 mesh material or 120 pounds (600 lbs. X 20%), and 480 pounds of the 20 to 60 mesh material (800 lbs. X 60%) are readily available. Adding the available portion of these two fractions of the material to the fine portion (30% X 2000 lbs.), we find that 1200 lbs. or only 60% of this limestone will be of value in correcting the acidity of the soil within a three-year period. Since the lime requirement of the soil is two tons of finely ground limestone, it will take 1.66 times as much of this material or 3.33 tons per acre (2000 ÷ 1200 X 2T = 3.33T.)

At present time only course ground limestone is available from the Appomattox Plant. However, plans are being made to again produce ground limestone, hopefully by the spring of 1973. The illustration given in the above paragraph does not necessarily represent the course ground limestone that is locally available, but demonstrates how to calculate the value of a product when its quality is known.
